HOUSTON – Education was a big area of agreement between the Texas House Education Committee and Gov. Greg Abbott during the special session, but it wasn't easy. The Texas House gave final approval to House Bill 5 on Thursday, clearing the way for it to go to the Senate. "It's been really a lesson that happens every year," said Rep. Dan Huberty, R-Canyon. "You see how the special session works, how the caucus works. You see how the process goes, in our caucus on how the bills move. I think that's been a good thing, watching the process." One of the biggest factors in the process was how committees came together to make compromises, Huberty said. "I think that's been an eye-opening thing to watch how they're all on the same page, how they work together," he said. Things got heated on the Education Committee during debate over the amount of money schools could spend on technology, and Rep. Eric Johnson, D-Dallas, was the main opponent to passing the bill. "This is about freedom of access," he said. "The vote tonight will be the end of the end for too many Texans. They will face financial ruin." Republican House members argued that there is too much money in the bill, and it's a spending issue. Some Republicans were concerned that the bill included too many exceptions and some fees. "The most overburdened districts are the largest districts, they're not our minority districts," Rep. Stephanie Klick, R-Fort Worth, said. "We heard from the mothers and fathers in our large districts 3da54e8ca3
